Continue reading the main story APPRECIATIONS I have received exactly one telegram in my life. It came on New Year's Eve a few decades ago. The message was congratulations -- it quoted J.D. Salinger -- and that was also the medium, that had a kind of all ships at sea feeling about it. In fact, the telegram was just a piece of paper that looked a little on its heels, as if it had been a ragged night for the telegraphers. But it came with a sense of its own occasion, which went a long way toward improving the occasion it had been sent to celebrate: a wedding. The last telegram ever delivered appears to have been sent by Western Union - whose name seems to say telegram - on January 27. It is easy to understand why the practice of sending telegrams expires. They simply couldn't compete with phones, express delivery services, email and sms -- which in its compression provided a curious analogy to the Wear. But knowing that the last telegram has now been delivered is somehow a bit like knowing that the last martini has been drunk or worn the last dinner jacket. I would like to believe that there will always be a world where where Come directly to the door, throwing a note of tension into the air. How many movies turn on that moment! The doorbell rings. A uniformed boy says: Telegram! or Western Union! He hands over an envelope in exchange for a tip, and the plot turns the corner. Only the phone has competed the telegram as a plot point. It's hard to imagine that email will ever play such a big role in Hollywood.It's likely too, though, that the telegram has gone its way. We're out of the habit. Almost none of us could open the door, turn the boy and slit the throat of the telegram with the atmosphere of familiarity -- even aplomb -- that one sees in the old movies. In these days when information flows like a river, when email comes and goes no matter how we are dressed or what change we have in our pockets, the telegram has become too singular, too memorable. Memorable.
